

Review
to the educational programme 'International Journalism' of the first (bachelor's) level of higher education at Uzhhorod National University

Transcarpathia is located in a cross-border information space, has a long history and is closely linked to international cooperation. For these reasons alone, the training of specialists in the field of international journalism is in high demand. Modern processes of European and global cooperation, as well as the need to seek dialogue between representatives of different countries, will only reinforce the need to train media professionals of international level. This is precisely what the Department of Journalism at UzhNU does.

The initiative has a bright future. After all, the university attaches great importance to international cooperation. And the proposed educational programme takes into account the main trends in the development of the journalism market. It is no coincidence that many disciplines are related to this field: 'Fundamentals of Mass Communication', 'Contemporary World Media', 'Analytical International Journalism'.

The programme clearly outlines general and professional competencies, provides for self-sufficient information and teaching materials, and takes into account international credit mobility. The structural and logical components of the programme are unquestionable.

Conclusion: this programme fully deserves to be implemented in a university format and is capable of training thoughtful international journalists who understand the needs of domestic and foreign audiences.
